The foundations of the American century were laid in the centuries leading up to World War II. These foundations include the political, economic, social, and cultural factors that shaped the development of the United States.

Political Foundations

The political foundations of the American century were laid in the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution. The Declaration of Independence, adopted in 1776, declared the thirteen American colonies' independence from Great Britain. The Constitution, adopted in 1789, established the framework for the federal government of the United States.

The Declaration of Independence and the Constitution are based on the principles of democracy, individual liberty, and limited government. These principles have been central to the American political system for over two centuries.

Economic Foundations

The economic foundations of the American century were laid in the Industrial Revolution. The Industrial Revolution began in Great Britain in the late 18th century and spread to the United States in the early 19th century. The Industrial Revolution transformed the way goods were produced, leading to a dramatic increase in economic growth.

The United States was able to take advantage of the Industrial Revolution due to its vast natural resources and its skilled workforce. The United States also benefited from a number of government policies that encouraged economic development, such as the tariff of 1816 and the land grant act of 1862.

Social Foundations

The social foundations of the American century were laid in the westward expansion of the United States. The westward expansion began in the early 19th century and continued for several decades. As Americans moved westward, they established new settlements and created new communities.

The westward expansion led to a number of social changes in the United States. These changes included the growth of the middle class, the decline of slavery, and the development of a more egalitarian society.

Cultural Foundations

The cultural foundations of the American century were laid in the American Renaissance. The American Renaissance was a period of cultural flowering that occurred in the United States in the mid-19th century. During this period, American writers, artists, and musicians produced some of the most important works of American culture.

The American Renaissance was influenced by a number of factors, including the westward expansion, the Industrial Revolution, and the rise of democracy. The American Renaissance helped to shape the American identity and to create a sense of national pride.

The foundations of the American century were laid in the centuries leading up to World War II. These foundations include the political, economic, social, and cultural factors that shaped the development of the United States. These foundations have enabled the United States to become the world's leading superpower and to play a major role in global affairs.
