Hope was born in Rhode Island in 1759. Her father was a wealthy merchant, and she grew up in a comfortable home. However, the outbreak of the war in 1775 changed everything. Hope's father was a strong supporter of the American cause, and he soon joined the militia. Hope and her mother were left alone to run the family business.

Hope's diaries begin in 1776. In her first entry, she describes the excitement and anticipation she felt at the outbreak of the war. She believed that the Americans would quickly defeat the British and win their independence. However, as the war dragged on, Hope's optimism began to dwindle. She witnessed the suffering and death that the war brought, and she began to doubt whether the American cause was worth fighting for.

In addition to her descriptions of the war, Hope's diaries also provide a glimpse into the daily life of ordinary people during the American Revolution. She writes about the food shortages, the lack of clothing, and the constant fear of attack. She also describes the ways in which women contributed to the war effort. Hope and her mother, for example, sewed clothes for the soldiers and donated money to the cause.

Hope's diaries end abruptly in 1780. The reason for this is unknown, but it is possible that she died or that her family was forced to flee their home. Whatever the reason, Hope's diaries provide a valuable and unique perspective on the American Revolution. They offer us a glimpse into the lives of ordinary people during this tumultuous period in American history.
